

Taking the Pulse of Your Organization for Returning to a Healthy Workplace

Getting feedback from employees to shape your company's return-to-the-workplace strategy

In times of major change, it's critical to keep a close watch on how your employees are adapting and feeling as you enter new territory.

Offering a company-wide survey as part of your post Covid-19 re-entry process gives everyone an equal, anonymous voice to express their concerns, questions, fears and excitement. It can also provide insight into how well employees understand the reasons for the changes and offer feedback that can guide you in refining your return-to-the-workplace communications plan.

It can be structured to subtly introduce updated policies and support the case for added safety and security measures that will be implemented in your new Healthy Workplace .

Beyond simply collecting data, a return-to-the-workplace survey can invite valuable discussion on important topics as well as communicate important messaging. The survey and the process used to manage it can be a strategic part of your re-entry process, helping to educate, inform and engage employees in a dialog about their work environment.

A survey with a mix of open-ended questions along with some multiple choice questions (such as the sample on the next page) allows employees an opportunity to express their thoughts in writing while collecting some numerical data.

Following is one approach of using a survey to take the pulse of an organization before implementing new Healthy Workplace policies and procedures.

Done correctly, a return-to-the-workplace survey can greatly increase your chances for a successful re-entry and give your employees the voice they expect in their evolving workplace.
